describes its whole surface as being covered with cinders and lava. When off the island, he saw the volcano emitting to some height columns of flame and smoke.

Both Lati and Koa have also the appearance of having craters, particularly the latter, the summit of which is cleft.

On the 1st of September, at daylight, they found themselves in shoal water, the bottom being distinctly seen, and the lead gave but fifteen fathoms depth. This proved to be an extensive shoal lying to the southwest of Vavao. A few hours after, they passed over another shoal, and were in nine fathoms: but the shoal was of much less extent.

At noon they took a white man, as pilot, on board, and passed into the fine bay of Vavao, called Port Refuge. In going in, they passed a large number of rocky islets, uninhabited, and of volcanic formation. The pilot informed Lieutenant-Commandant Ringgold that there were still five of the Shylock's crew on the island, the rest having been taken off by H. B. M. sloop Favourite, bound for Sydney.

The Porpoise anchored in twenty-seven fathoms water, in the outer harbour of Port Refuge. This harbour is an extensive and beautiful sheet of water, studded with many islets with bold and steep shores; there is little tide, and no concealed dangers. They were boarded by a canoe, which showed a printed document in Tongese and English, containing the regulations of the port; among them was one prohibiting the introduction and sale of spirits, and another fixing the fees for pilotage, and other services.

The inner harbour is completely land-locked, and on its shores the village is situated, which is of considerable size, with a large native mission church, and a good parsonage-house. The town, as well as island, looked desolate, from the effects of the severe hurricanes, of which they have had for several years a succession. The houses, fences, trees, &c., were many of them prostrate and going to ruin. Few natives are to be seen, and those are only the old, decrepit, and very young; for all the warriors had accompanied King George to Tongataboo, to carry on the war against the Devil's party.

Lieutenant-Commandant Ringgold, and his officers, visited the mission, and found the parsonage exceedingly comfortable and wellarranged, exhibiting a strong contrast to the devastation and ruin of the native huts and houses. The Rev. Mr. Thomas is the resident missionary. A printing-press is established here.

The missionaries from Tonga had lately made their escape, in H. B. M. ship Favourite, from the seat of war. The report of the death of the commander of the Favourite, Captain Croker, which I had heard
