

genuine. But they are dependent upon water; secondary in their nature; resting upon solubility and ionization; upon interactions between the two substances. So they lead us to a consideration of the most intricate of all mutual relations, to a purely chemical study of the compounds of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, into which water and carbonic acid can be transformed.