

the inner planets were in existence before the sun, Faye supposes that the first traces of organic life on the earth originated under the diffuse light of the still unconsolidated sun, that a uniform climate reigned over the whole earth during the Primary epochs, and that consequently the distribution of plant and animal life cannot, as is frequently stated, have proceeded from the Poles.